Our Processing Systems

Unpolished Millets Grains process Explained.

Cleaning: The first step in processing millets involves cleaning them thoroughly to remove any impurities such as dust, dirt, stones, or debris. This is usually done by passing the millets through a series of sieves or screens that separate the grains from unwanted particles. Alternatively, air blowers can be used to remove lighter impurities.

Dehusking: Millets have an outer layer called the husk, which needs to be removed to access the edible part of the grain. Dehusking can be done mechanically using machines specifically designed for this purpose. These machines typically employ abrasive surfaces or rollers to remove the husk while minimizing damage to the grain.

Grading and Sorting: After dehusking, the millets are graded and sorted based on size, shape, and color. This step ensures uniformity in the final product and removes any remaining impurities or defective grains.

Packaging: Once the millets are cleaned, dehusked, and sorted, they are ready for packaging. Packaging is typically done in moisture-proof bags or containers to maintain freshness and prevent contamination during storage and transportation.

Quality Control: Throughout the processing steps, quality control measures are implemented to ensure that the millets meet the required standards for hygiene, purity, and nutritional content. This involves regular inspections, testing, and adherence to food safety regulations.
